

ONSC decision in Kwong v iAnthus Capital Holdings Inc.

March 14, 2024

In Kwong v iAnthus Capital Holdings Inc., the Ontario Superior Court issued an important reminder that in class proceedings, a settlement will only be approved where the parties can demonstrate that the settlement is fair, reasonable, and in the best interests of the class.

Background

The plaintiff, on behalf of the class of shareholders, claimed against the corporate defendant, iAnthus Capital Holdings Inc., alleging that iAnthus had omitted material facts in their disclosed statements to shareholders. When such facts were eventually disclosed, the value of iAnthus' common shares plummeted and never recovered.

In May 2020, a class proceeding was filed against iAnthus and others in the United States. In July 2020, and in September 2020, two putative class proceedings were commenced in Canada for the same underlying issue as the U.S. proceeding. In 2021, the Canadian proceedings were consolidated but, as a secondary market misrepresentation matter, leave to proceed was required and the motion for leave was scheduled for February 2022. Between consolidation and the motion for leave, the parties to the Canadian proceeding advised the Court that a settlement had been reached, subject to Court approval. In November 2023, the Ontario Superior Court certified a class action on consent of the parties, and a motion to approve settlement was scheduled for 2024.

The decision: The Ontario Superior Court does not approve class settlement

The proposed settlement terms called for the defendant to pay C$500,000.00 in exchange for a class release. This settlement amount reflected all that remained under the defendant's insurance policy following its settlement of the U.S. proceeding for U$2.9 million (approximately C$3.9 million). The amount was subject to deductions for legal fees, administration fees, a representative plaintiff honorarium, and disbursements that left approximately $196,000 for class distribution.

The Court acknowledged the strong presumption of fairness in a proposed settlement that was negotiated at arms-length by experienced counsel, and that a proposed settlement need not be a perfect solution, only a solution within the range of reasonable outcomes. However, and despite these presumptions, the Court did not approve the settlement based on a troubling lack of evidence in the record.

Specifically, the Court identified the plaintiff's failure to obtain an expert opinion, and the parties' decision not to proceed with discoveries, as acts which produced an evidentiary record that was deficient in:

1. explaining the plaintiff's evaluation of the claim;
2. demonstrating the likely recovery amount per shareholder;
3. illuminating the settlement negotiation between parties; and
4. justifying a significantly inferior settlement as compared to the U.S. settlement despite evidence that Canadian trading volume was 1.5 times that of the U.S. during the relevant time.

Key takeaways

This decision provides a timely reminder of the importance of a sufficient evidentiary record in any class settlement. This is pertinent for all parties who are considering resolution of a class proceeding, particularly at an early stage. A court's job is not to rubber-stamp a settlement simply because it was reached through an arms-length negotiation by experienced class counsel. The onus rests with the plaintiff to prove that a settlement is fair, reasonable, and in the best interests of the class, and a court will require a sufficient evidentiary record to make its assessment of that criteria. While litigation cost is an important factor for parties to consider in any proceeding, any decision to forgo steps in a proceeding that would otherwise bolster an evidentiary record may impact the viability of a proposed settlement.
