

ESG claims: Managing risks and liabilities for Canadian businesses

March 11, 2022

The concept of environmental, social and governance (ESG) has become almost ubiquitous. ESG generally refers to the environmental, social, and governance factors that can affect company value and investor decisions. In this article, we briefly outline some key considerations for managing litigation and regulatory risk for Canadian companies making ESG claims and highlight some relevant cases.

What you need to know

- Strong ESG performance is valued by many shareholders and consumers, and can be a way to differentiate your brand.
- Failure to take sufficient action on ESG matters can risk proxy contests and harm to a company's business. Businesses should be aware of and understand the legal obligations to disclose information relating to ESG, as failure to abide by them can result in enforcement and other sanctions.
- Companies should routinely audit and revise their ESG frameworks to ensure that they are up to date with their operations and ever-evolving industry best practices. Companies should ensure that they choose an appropriate ESG framework for their intended audience.
- To reduce the risk of misstatements or inconsistent statements, boards and management should have a proactive process for reviewing and approving ESG disclosure prior to its public release. A robust legal review is also advisable.
- Canadian businesses should be careful to scrutinize their ESG disclosure to ensure it aligns with their operations.
- ESG disclosures should be relevant to the specific entity, measurable, and grounded in verifiable data.

ESG overview

Although similar to the concept of corporate social responsibility, ESG relates to factors that are financially material to a company's business and includes such wide-ranging considerations as climate change, modern slavery, diversity, equity, and inclusion. Recent years have seen growing market and shareholder demand for businesses to implement and report on their ESG commitments and performance.

In response to this demand, companies are increasingly identifying, measuring, and disclosing ESG factors that are material to their operations. While in the past this disclosure was largely voluntary, recent years have seen many levels of government adopt ESG factors as part of their mandatory reporting requirements, which has inevitably led to an expanded risk of litigation and other attempts to hold companies accountable for their claims.

ESG litigation

ESG litigation and regulatory risks generally fall into two broad categories. The first category includes allegations of false ESG claims or misrepresentations in a company's ESG disclosure. Companies risk both regulatory action and consumer- or investor-led class actions related to alleged misrepresentations.¹ The second category of litigation risk includes claims directly challenging a company's ESG-related conduct or perceived lapses in ESG action. Recent trends in Canada, and globally, include attempts to hold companies accountable for conduct by suppliers or subsidiaries in foreign jurisdictions² and subject companies to litigation for the contribution of their greenhouse gas emissions to climate change.³

Even if a company can successfully defend a claim on the merits, being forced to defend an ESG record can be costly and lead to reputational harm. Historically, many ESG programs and reports have had little legal oversight or input. To manage the risk of litigation and regulatory or administrative sanctions, businesses should proactively involve experienced legal assistance to review how they are addressing ESG issues while guarding against overstating their commitments and actions.
